The term “human migration” forms a major part of human history. It has been practiced from historic times in various parts of the globe and for various reasons. Generally, the concept is defined as the movement or change from one geographical area to another, as well as across the border. It involves external migration, which means movement across an internationally recognized border, i.e. moving from one country to the other or one continent to another. Internal migration means movement within a recognized border, located in the same state or country, including rural migrations. There are some core truths and joys about country living and rural migrations. Urban areas typically have a large population, a high population density and much social and economic infrastructure and amenities. Moving to a favourable rural area to live and work there discover once they’ve made the move. However, the rates of such migrate movements differ, with generally high rates seen in developing nations.
